St. Mary's Hospital/Manhattan YMCA, 1100 Fremont Street

Originally built in the Classical Revival style with reception and dormitory rooms in its original east wing, its west wing housed a two-story gymnasium. This building configuration was revised to accommodate a hospital in 1926, and a college fraternity in 1955.

In 1958, the gymnasium was removed and replaced with a modern-era wing that provided individual sleeping rooms on the second floor and a lounge and housemother's quarters on the first floor. The adaptability of this finely built structure is a testimony to its robustness and resiliency. The building retains a high degree of integrity for both the original and 1958 portions. The building is an excellent example of both the twentieth century revival style and the mid-century modern style in Manhattan, Kansas.

The property is architecturally significant as an elegantly and functionally designed building that has accommodated three primary users over its lifespan. It is currently functioning as the Delta Sigma Phi Fraternity House.
